Q

44) I want to do little deeper dive on Q's warning: "Prepare for zero-day [massive cyber-power] attacks [attempts] on 11.4."

45) The classic scenario of a zero-day attack is when a bad actor finds a security vulnerability in a software program and rather than reporting it to the software maker, they exploit it.

46) A security vulnerability can be exploited as long as the software company is unaware of it. Once they're aware of it, they design a patch that removes access through the vulnerability.

47) The Wikileaks Vault 7 dump exposed the fact that the CIA had been accumulating software vulnerabilities for years and exploiting them, rather than reporting them to the software makers.

Can the CIA and NSA be trusted with cyber hacking tools?

Both the WannaCry and Petya-variant attacks were based on exploiting software vulnerabilities revealed by leaks from the NSA.

<https://www.nbcnews.com/news/us-news/can-cia-nsa-be-trusted-cyber-hacking-tools-n...>

48) The problem with accumulating vulnerabilities is that hackers can gain access to them and hold companies and nations hostage. Hackers sometimes demand ransom payments to call off their attack.

The WannaCry" ransomware attack is a recent example.

What is WannaCry ransomware, how does it infect, and who was respo...

Stolen government hacking tools, unpatched Windows systems, and shadowy North Korean operatives made WannaCry a perfect ransomware storm.

<https://www.csoonline.com/article/3227906/what-is-wannacry-ransomware-how-does-it...>

49) Q seems to be warning that bad actors who have accumulated software vulnerabilities may exploit all of them on the same day (November 4th) launching a massive zero-day attack in an attempt to derail President Trump's second term in office.

50) Rather than breaking the internet the way most people envision it, a massive zero-day exploit would attack the software and devices that we use to access the internet.

51) Such an attack could lead to the following potential problems:

52) What would happen if vulnerabilities in web browsers like Safari, Firefox, Edge, Chrome, and Brave were all exploited on the same day?

Anyone who uses a desktop computer to access the internet would effectively be locked out.

53) If you use a tablet or phone to access the internet, a zero-day exploit of your device's operating system would lock you out, and we know such vulnerabilities exist.

54) If you have a smart TV, refrigerator, or other household appliance that is connected to the internet, those devices could also become unusable through a zero-day attack.

55) If Q's use of the word "power" is a warning of an attack on the power grid, I would assume that bad actors figure their vulnerabilities will take down power grids by virtue of the fact that their control systems are dependent on software programs that have vulnerabilities.
